Indoor Air 2011 will consist of nearly 200 hours of technical sessions, forums, workshops, and cutting-edge panel discussions on microbiomes of built environments, climate change and indoor air quality, IAQ and cook stoves in developing countries, health effects of indoor pollutants, weatherization and IAQ, thermal comfort, ventilation, sustainable buildings, green products, indoor chemistry, control technologies, SVOCs, emerging pollutants, environmental justice, airborne infectious disease transmission, IAQ in schools, hospitals, aircraft, and much more. The plenary sessions will consist of 12 internationally-recognized experts who will deliver opening, daily, and closing keynote addresses.

The organizers of Indoor Air 2011 are proud to have also developed a unique Innovations in Practice Program (I2P2) designed to bring together practitioners, researchers, and policymakers, including afternoon researcher panels who will address practitioner-driven questions ranging from mold to hydroxyl generators, lunchtime discussions on best residential practices for expectant parents to maintain healthy homes, as well as an indoor air quality rating system for existing and new office buildings. And eligible practitioners can obtain CEUs from various professional organizations.

In addition to a cutting-edge technical program, attendees will be able to explore America's most eco-friendly city and engage in an exciting evening social program (free to full registrants) that includes ballet folklorico, Mariachi bands, margaritas, barbeque in the legendary Texas Hill Country, and great music from Austin musicians in the Music Capital of the World.

The California Air Resources Board is a Bronze Oak sponsor of Indoor Air 2011.

Don't get caught flat booted. If you do anything in the arena of indoor air quality & comfort, Austin is the place to giddyup to in June! Be there or be counting tumbleweeds.
